LIFE AND LITERATURE

By

PROF. WILLIAM LYON PHELPS (Yale)

(America's Most Interesting Commentator)

READING HENRY JAMES

Henry James was born in 1843 and died in 1916.

He never wrote a best-seller; he never had a very large number of readers; he never used propaganda; he never wrote any novel because the time seemed opportune; he never tried to adjust his plots or his characters to fit any particular current popular approval and was singularly pleased with intelligent appreciation.

Yet the fact remains that while many of his contemporaries, who enjoyed popularity during his life-time are now little read and perhaps eternally forgotten, the fame of Henry James—as distinguished from his popularity—is greater now than it has ever been; and his influence on other writers more powerful and more formative than most persons suppose.

It will never do to dismiss him as a writer who was interested only in the art of expression to the exclusion of feeling and passion; or that he was interested only in the superficial details of fashions and manners. For the truth is, that Henry James was interested only in the human soul; in the springs of action; in the uncharted places of personality. He was a frontiersman in thought; as pioneers and explorers are frontiersmen in geography. He loved to venture far out into the unexplored regions of the human heart. He was a genius.

If there are any of my readers who have not read many of his books, I should like to suggest that they begin to read his novels in the following order. 1. "The American." 2. "Daisy Miller." 3. "Frederick Hudson." 4. "The Portrait of a Lady." 5. "The Turn of the Screw." 6—but I think if you have read so far as this, nothing can stop you from reading the others.

LONE BURRO EXPRESS—The first known instance of a little burro operating over a long mountain trail without human direction is the "Midnight Express" between Quartzville and Roberts, Oregon. There the burro travels the road alone, carrying mail and orders for supplies from operators of a placer mine, over a rocky, rugged route of 26 miles the round trip. This "train," like all others, carries its identifying sound — a bell instead of a whistle — and never fails to make its arrival known. THE SURVIVING MAN—Before he began shrinking, Hans Nelson of Minneapolis, was just 5 feet, 10½ inches tall. In five years he shrank down to an even 5 feet in height, then underwent an operation, hoping to grow up again. The shrinking was caused by malfunctioning of a gland, withdrawing calcium from his bones.
